The role of selected neurotransmitters and agents was studied in the isolated, perfused cat brain during transitions between sleep and wakefulness. Depolarizing currents (7-9 mA) were applied to the medial septal nucleus (MSN) and the ventral portion of the medial habenular nucleus (v-MHN) (a wake-promoting portion of the basal forebrain) and produced a different latency in the onset of slow-wave sleep (SWS) or paradoxical sleep (PS) in the MSN and the v-MHN, respectively. In addition, the MSN always entered SWS before the v-MHN. In the MSN and the v-MHN, gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA), quinolinic acid, 5-hydroxytryptamine (5
