One of the most popular responses to our post last week on the problem of “witchcraft” or “witch-hunting” in some parts of sub-Saharan Africa was a comment from Didier Rousset, a French scholar of the history of Christianity in West Africa, who was referring to the decline of traditional belief systems in the region: “I am very much afraid that many of these interpretations are nothing more than a very convenient cover for bad behavior and economic failure. This is especially true in the case of Djoudj (aka Diouate). In the case of Djoudj, the name itself makes us think that it is a typical African village where men are usually most attracted to young women who may be willing to play the role of a ‘witch’. The real problem is that many of these young girls have been deserted or forced into marriage at a very young age. They are victims of an ‘illicit’ or ‘prostitute’ trade that is actually conducted by men, both Western men and other Africans. Many Djoudj residents are really just desperate for money and end up falling victim to this new ‘market’.” Djoudj is indeed the most common form of witch-hunting in Senegal. In some cases, however, what is happening in Djoudj is different from the picture Rousset has outlined. Sometimes the case involves a woman who is indeed willingly participating in traditional beliefs and practices. We had a woman in our program who was willing to describe the causes of her illness, and willing to tell us about the beliefs that she once had. When the people involved in the case discovered that she was a modern woman, she 2d92ce491b
