Tammy Duckworth (D-Ill.) is introducing a bill this week that would prohibit federal funding to any university that requires prospective students to provide detailed sexual orientation information in order to gain admission. The legislation is modeled on the University of Texas's controversial "affirmative consent" policy, which was enacted in 2011 and has been the subject of a lawsuit over its constitutionality. The Texas policy defines "affirmative consent" as "verbal or non-verbal conduct" that is "ongoing and freely given." But as the University of California, Davis has explained, a potential "zero-tolerance" policy on sexual assault could require prospective students to disclose every sexual encounter and relationship they have with other students. Read more on the University of Texas's campus Duckworth introduced the legislation on Wednesday, seeking to address a problem in many American universities. In her bill, she says that more than half of colleges and universities require prospective students to disclose their sexual orientation when they fill out campus applications. Such disclosures, Duckworth says, can have a chilling effect on gay and lesbian students. "All students—not just LGBT students—should have the opportunity to attend college without fear of discrimination, harassment, and bullying. This bill ensures that every prospective college student can attend with the peace of mind that they will be treated equally and with respect regardless of their sexual orientation," Duckworth said in a statement. "I have witnessed first-hand the detrimental impact that anti-LGBT bullying has had on LGBT students and urge all colleges and universities to adopt similar policies that protect
