Alzheimer's disease (AD) is the most common neurodegenerative disorder in the world and despite billions of dollars spent in research, there is no effective therapy for this disease. Blood flow abnormalities in the brain are an important pathology associated with AD, and we and others have reported that these changes can be reversed in models of the disease. These data provide strong evidence that a cerebral hemodynamic deficit, rather than only an increase in beta-amyloid protein, is an important pathological substrate in AD. We present here a review of the current literature with the aim of proposing that an increase in cerebral blood flow (CBF) might be a strategy for the therapy of AD. Efficacy of a smoking cessation program for emergency department patients. We designed and conducted a smoking cessation program for a medical/surgical emergency department (ED) to assess its efficacy and safety. We enrolled 146 patients who smoked or who had a history of smoking. Patients were enrolled in a smoking cessation program (6-week treatment, follow-up of 2 weeks), which included use of nicotine replacement therapy (NRT) and/or bupropion. In the program, we evaluated the patients for 7 days by using a checklist and a questionnaire. We enrolled 76 men and 70 women. The mean age was 48 years (range, 21 to 72 years). Fifty-five (37.2%) patients completed the program, and 86 (57.3%) patients wanted to quit smoking. Twenty-seven (18.5%) patients dropped out. Eight (5.5%) patients had adverse effects and three (2.0%) had serious adverse effects. The program was significantly associated with smoking cessation. The most significant adverse effect was dizziness. We found that an ED smoking cessation program is useful for both patients and health care professionals.
