Sunday, August 11, 2011 So I finally found some time to drive through East Link's Lakewood/Tukwila Connection Trail--a distance of 10.5 miles or so. On the way, I picked up two pairs of Google sneakers (don't worry, I washed them) and a coffee and an orange juice (which was awesome). I've lived in the Tri-Cities my entire life, and I have never and will never, under any circumstances, ride a bike on a trail. I have to cross just about every major road in the Tri-Cities, so why should I subject myself to that? Plus, if I was going to do a 10.5 mile ride, it'd be nice to know exactly where I was going, right? So, I decided to route along one of the most used trails--East Link. I ran into only three cyclists on the entire trail (including myself). When we were half-way through the 10.5 miles (just north of 7th Street), I was essentially rolling in how much exercise I was getting with all the walking and running around, and at this point, I was at the beginning of my second loop (though I had no idea I'd be going this much farther). By the time I made it home, and parked on the street, my legs were sore, but I had a good run, and I felt a good long way done. Here are some pictures of some of the places I passed that I haven't seen before, as well as a little bit about what I saw. North Lake Club: I never thought that bike clubhouses were this awesome. Truly. Look at the end of this picture. That is an amazing place. Rainier Corner: When I left, this was just a big gate that blocked off the trail. By the time I came back, it had blown in ba244e880a
