Microcirculation in the lung is now thought to be important in the pathogenesis of many inflammatory lung diseases. We have developed a pulmonary microcirculatory blood flow measurement technique based on the dilution of a laser-scattering agent injected into a segmental or lobar pulmonary artery. The injection of the laser-scattering agent dilutes the sample blood concentration and permits calculations of its mean transit time. Our blood flow measurement system consists of three components: (1) the laser-scattering agent, (2) a small percutaneous catheter-based injector, and (3) a dual-channel laser-light analyzer. We describe and evaluate this fiber optic blood flow measurement system. It is compact, precise, and yields a wide dynamic range of sensitivity for small changes in blood flow. The mean transit time of red cells in the subpleural microcirculation was not significantly altered by the preocclusion of right and left pulmonary arterial flow by a loose ligature of the pulmonary artery. The system was successfully used to measure microcirculatory blood flow in 10 dogs with a mean pulmonary arterial pressure ranging from 8 to 27 mmHg. The microcirculatory blood flow ranged from 0.3 to 1.2 ml/min in the microcirculatory network of the dog lung at rest and increased to 16.0 +/- 3.4 (SD) ml/min in the subpleural region during nitroprusside infusion (15 micrograms/kg/min). The mean pulmonary arterial pressure was elevated to 43 +/- 7.5 mmHg. These preliminary results suggest that this technique may be useful in the study of pulmonary vascular physiology and the evaluation of changes in the pulmonary microcirculation in animals and humans during various medical and surgical conditions.Q: Select one single image in a collection I use Laravel 5.2 and Angular to build an application.
