The air conditioning in the conference hall was turned off, leaving the family trapped in the hot, humid room. The woman began to panic and then to sweat profusely. Romanoff immediately got up and led the family to a nearby restaurant where they could wait until they could find a hotel with air-conditioning. It is possible for companies to equip each conference space with air-conditioning and heat-generating equipment that can be turned on and off to protect people from the heat. However, such equipment is expensive, complicated and not in widespread use. But a new software program being developed at the IBM Research Center in Almaden, Calif., is designed to make air-conditioning and heating more available and affordable. Called N-Heating, the software will let conference organizers specify how hot or cold the meeting hall should be. N-Heating includes three aspects: air conditioning and heating, a sensing and actuation mechanism and a communications system to allow the software to communicate with the heating and cooling equipment. "This year, we are releasing a full version of N-Heating," said Sridhar Ramani, a senior staff member at the IBM Research Center in Almaden. "We have tested N-Heating with more than 500 people for more than 100 hours. It can cool to more than 10 degrees Celsius and more than 40 degrees Fahrenheit. "And we can run the software from more than one computer, with no direct human interaction," he added. The cost of 2d92ce491b
