The measure would implement fines of between US$40 and $50 per violation, according to Associated Press news agency reports. Argentina's central bank, which oversees the national currency, the peso, has used monetary law on several occasions to rein in the use of the word dólar or dollar, but it would be the first time fines have been imposed. The government of President Mauricio Macri introduced the measure in December 2017 but didn't move forward with it. The idea for the legislation came from Education Minister Esteban Bullrich, who told local media last year that the use of the word dólar would be "insulting." "It will start with a fine. And then, they'll have to start searching people and they're going to find out if they have the dollar or the peso under their shirt," Bullrich said at the time. The minister's comments sparked discussion in Argentina about whether it was the government's place to rein in the word "dólar." The central bank responded by issuing a statement saying that the word dólar is not the "property of the government" and that there is no law that bars it from being used. The measure is now supported by lawmakers including the president of the Senate, Gabriela Michetti, and the secretary general of the Senate, Guillermo Castelo. "We can't just allow the word 'dollar' to be thrown around as if it were like an app or something," Michetti said at a Senate committee hearing on the bill. Argentina's peso has recovered from its precipitous drop after a massive devaluation last year, and is worth almost $25 more than a year ago. It's also little more than half the price of the dollar. The dollar has also climbed in value over the past year, but remains about twice as expensive as the peso. The two currencies have had a wild ride in the last few years, since the government defaulted on its debt in 2016 and devalued its currency 3ef4e8ef8d
