U.S. stocks lost more ground Wednesday, giving back a gain of a fifth straight session, as the S&P 500 climbed to a five-week high after three straight days of gains. The Dow Jones industrial average finished down 19 points, or 0.1%, at 15,442. The broader index rose to its highest level since last month. The market entered the day having posted gains for the past five sessions, but the rally was dented by three sell-offs in three trading days. The S&P 500 has dropped 1.2% in the past three sessions. The oil price settled up from near five-year lows, rising more than 1% after the close. Oil prices have dropped 25% in the past three months as U.S. crude stockpiles increased to record highs. The rally was driven by optimism the U.S. and China will sign an interim trade deal, which could lead to a larger accord. Meanwhile, U.S. markets are awaiting a flurry of earnings reports before the Federal Reserve releases its policy decision at 2 p.m. ET Wednesday. S&P 500 industrial companies are on track to report their first sales decline in more than a year. The decline could put pressure on the Federal Reserve's agenda, as it has pointed to slowing global economic growth as a reason to keep hiking interest rates. "This is a positive environment to do better than you think," said Jackie DeMarco, chief investment strategist at New York Life Insurance Co. "Any kind of red flag would be negative for equ
