The number of circulating leukocytes is increased in inflammatory conditions, such as burns and sepsis. This increase may be due to an increased sequestration of leukocytes in the microcirculation, reduced margination and adherence, or an increased margination and emigration. We investigated the effects of pentoxifylline, a xanthine derivative, on leukocyte-endothelial cell interactions in vitro. The leukocytes were allowed to adhere for 1 hour to bovine aortic endothelial cells in the presence of pentoxifylline ( $10^{-7}$  to  $10^{-4}$  mol/L). The inhibitory effects of the drug on leukocyte adherence were measured by the reduction in adherent leukocytes after 60 minutes of incubation. A significant inhibition of the adherence was observed at  $10^{-4}$  mol/L of pentoxifylline ( $17.4 \pm 3.7\%$ ; mean  $\pm$  SEM). Pentoxifylline was also found to significantly decrease the surface expression of ICAM-1, E-selectin, and LFA-1. On the basis of these observations, we believe that pentoxifylline may have beneficial effects in patients with inflammation.A Perfect Weekend: L.A.
