Q: How to prevent GUI crash from triggering another function? I have a GUI application that has a "Recorder" window. The user can also set the "Recorder" to "Stopped" state. Whenever the application enters this state, i perform a few cleanup functions (changing the current file, and so on). In my users' cases, if they hit the "Stop" button while the "Recorder" window is in this state, the application crashes. I'm using Qt and i can't catch the crash with a signal as the application returns an error code (Qt::UnknownError). How do you manage a situation like this, without using signals? A: You could use QSettings to save the last activity state of your GUI application, and check that state before attempting to start the recorder. There are no error codes to catch, the recorder

"crash" would be the end of a session, and the application is expected to be in a consistent state when a user stops it. Anyway, it's not an error, but simply the application is in a bad state, so you can clean it up and try again. The Qt documentation should come in handy here. Bone tissue growth factor-beta induces a transforming growth factor-beta-responsive skeletal muscle phenotype in C2C12 myoblasts. Muscle-specific transcription factors MyoD and myogenin are critical for the development of skeletal muscle. They must be activated to initiate the process of muscle differentiation, and become downregulated during terminal differentiation. Myoblast cell lines expressing large quantities of MyoD and myogenin (C2C12 myoblasts) have proven useful for the identification of many factors that regulate skeletal muscle differentiation. Here we report that TGF-beta family members can
