The Labor Department said in a notice that it will end the program effective July 31, 2019, citing a large number of workers at lower wages and a high turnover rate. Instead, the department will seek public comments for a proposed rule that would require all employers seeking the visa to offer their workers at least $10.10 an hour, well above the current wage of $10.67. The visa program, known as the H-2B, has been used to allow tens of thousands of workers to fill seasonal service jobs during winter months when demand for holiday help is highest. It was set up in the 1980s in response to high unemployment in the construction industry. The administration said it would also seek comments on ending an exemption in federal law for agricultural employers and a related visa program. "The H-2B visa program has been used to replace American workers with lower-wage foreign workers, hurting U.S. workers, depressing wages, and fostering a climate of illegal, abusive labor practices," acting Labor Secretary David J. Gifford said in a statement. The announcement puts pressure on Congress to agree to more restrictive changes, which Democratic and Republican lawmakers have promised for years. The program is currently tied up in court as two lawsuits filed by the Labor Department and coalition of business groups seek to block the Trump administration's implementation of an Obama-era rule that imposed stricter standards on the program. Under the Trump plan, H-2B workers would be required to compete with willing U.S. workers for jobs. The law allows a cap of 85,000 H-2B visas, most of which are for hospitality 1cb139a0ed
