image data converted into a digital signal. Image processing devices for taking pictures are also available which receive image data supplied from the built-in semiconductor memory of the digital camera and perform the same processing as that of the film camera. The one form of the digital camera is provided with an image memory device having a relatively large capacity for storing image data picked-up by the solid-state imager, such as an integrated CCD or CMOS imager. This memory device is exclusively used for storing image data, and is not designed to hold recording media such as a memory card. Since a built-in semiconductor memory device is exclusively used for storing picture image data, it is not possible to store image data taken by the film camera. That is, it is not possible to store image data taken by the film
