studies have examined the economics of transitioning from fossil fuels to renewable fuels, the impact of alternative fuels in the short term on jobs in fossil fuel industry jobs and, more importantly, on fossil fuel-intensive industries has never been examined. The recent European Union carbon-tax plan, which is rapidly becoming the norm in many countries around the world, may shed light on this important variable, at least on the impact of "green" energy on a "fossil fuel" industry. What this study actually finds is that the presence of European Union carbon taxes on gasoline, diesel and coal are likely to not just have no effect on employment in the fossil fuel industry, but could actually decrease employment in the nation. It's really not all that complicated. The prospect of a carbon tax and the rapidly approaching European Union deadline for requiring fuel sellers to produce even more renewable energy sources is likely to cause consumers to demand more of the fuel they already consume. This could cause consumers to actually purchase more of the 3e33713323
