Bovine mastitis is a highly prevalent disease in dairy cows worldwide. Milking cows twice daily is the most common practice for mastitis diagnosis and treatment in the bovine industry. However, twice daily milking has been identified as one of the causes of enhanced sensitivity in dairy cows to aflatoxicosis. The objectives of this study were to investigate the effects of aflatoxin B1, aflatoxin B2, and aflatoxicosis on the incidence and post-infection symptoms of bovine mastitis. The effects of the preventive and therapeutic treatments for aflatoxicosis and for mastitis were also investigated. The experiment was carried out with 250 lactating Holstein-Friesian dairy cows, treated with aflatoxin B1 (n = 125), aflatoxin B2 (n = 125) and aflatoxicosis (n = 50) or left untreated (n = 50) at housing. Each group of treated cows was separated to two treatments: preventive group (n = 50) that was treated with aflatoxin B1 from the day of calving up to 30 days post partum, and therapeutic group (n = 55) that was treated with aflatoxin B1 from 30 days post partum up to 12 days post lactation. The preventive and therapeutic treatments were both effective in reducing the incidence of mastitis in dairy cows. The reduction in the incidence of mastitis was 23% in the preventive group and 47% in the therapeutic
