The study, published in Nature Neuroscience, also shows that FOXP2 binds to and regulates a set of genes, known as the "GABA switch," that is important for vocal learning in songbirds. The study's findings suggest that FOXP2 may play a role in the development of speech disorders such as dyslexia or aphasia, as well as in disorders that may affect the singing process. Lead author, Jelena Markic, Ph.D., from the University of Texas at Austin's Institute for Cellular and Molecular Biology, and other scientists from UT Austin and the Howard Hughes Medical Institute (HHMI) collaborated on this study. "Most of the research on speech and language disorders is focused on how a child's brain develops during the first years of life, but genes also play an important role in this process," Markic said. "This study highlights the role of FOXP2, a master gene that is thought to regulate language in other animals, in the human brain." Nearly all humans have a "left brain" and a "right brain," which is often called the "dominant" or "control" side. The two sides of the brain are connected by a thin bundle of nerve fibers called the corpus callosum. Markic and her colleagues used a high-throughput sequencing technique to identify rare genetic variations in this gene that could disrupt the gene's function. They found four such variations that occurred together
