In particular PEMFCs have been proposed for portable applications as an alternative to rechargeable batteries. The basic components of a PEMFC include a proton-conducting proton exchange membrane sandwiched between an anode and a cathode. Protons are conducted from the anode to the cathode via the membrane and electrons reach the cathode via an external circuit. Energy is produced by the electrochemical reaction of hydrogen, which is supplied to the anode, with oxygen, which is supplied to the cathode. In actual operation, the fuel is preferably gas such as hydrogen or methanol while the oxidant is typically air. In a typical flow field plate construction for a PEMFC, two flow-field plates are disposed on either side of the proton-exchange membrane. On one side the flow-field plate is bonded to the membrane with a suitable adhesive and on the other side of the flow-field plate there is a bonding pad for connection with the external circuit. Flow fields on the flow-field plates are not directly bonded to the membrane. In a conventional configuration, flow fields are positioned at the edges of the flow-field plates and on either end of the electrode such that the flow fields are the only components of the flow-field plate which directly contact the membrane. However, the size of the flow-field plate is large since it must have enough area to provide a suitable path for transporting fuel to the catalyst layer and to carry product water away. A conventional flow-field plate is illustrated in FIG. 1A. The flow-field plate of FIG. 1A includes a catalyst layer 13 adhered to a substrate 11. A primary flow field 15 is defined on the edge of the flow-field plate, having a plurality of rows of fuel transport holes 17. A secondary flow field 19 is defined on the edge of the flow-field plate, having a plurality of rows of water transport holes 21. The primary and secondary flow fields 15 and 19 are separated by a barrier layer 13 which is in contact with the membrane. The flow fields 15 and 19 define fuel and product water flow paths to the catalyst layer 13. The fuel/water pathways also
