ENSO is a new-in-2016 short-term El Niño forecast model that uses only global atmospheric and oceanic data, no external forcing nor ENSO forecasts, to project the next 30-36 months of El Niño and La Niña probabilities. ENSO has a forecast skill that is statistically indistinguishable from the historically best predictions from the NOAA ENSO research team. ENSO generates strong signals for the next event and the relative position of the official ENSO partners, the TAR and TR. ENSO's maximum confidence in the official ENSO forecast and further quantitative information can be found via the West Coast Climate Center: ENSO code, descriptions and history; Outlook for equatorial Pacific Ocean basin dynamics during 2016-2018: Key to the ENSO outlook Global SST anomalies: no strong signals for the next event, but TR will swing towards the NSW pole within the next two months. The official ENSO forecasts - The TR and TAR: The ENSO forecast outlook map for 2016-2018 highlights well the expectation for a strong ENSO below +0.5 and La Niña below -0.5 later in 2016. The official ENSO forecast team members enjoy great confidence in their 2016-2018 forecasts and with this confidence we provide two main ENSO forecast outlook maps: ENSO predictions for the past three years. ENSO predictions based on the historical record of El Niño and La Niña. The ENSO forecast accuracy is based on ensemble forecasts from the following models: General Circulation Models (GMS) Indian Ocean Dipole (IOD) forecasts (Ocean modes and Indian monsoon) The ENSO forecast teams and key partners at NOAA and CSIRO have come to the opinion that a new generation of state-of-the-art, validated ENSO forecast models is necessary. ENSO Live Monitoring The following software and Web sites provide official GPM models - some of them validated - that are updated every 30 minutes and as often as every 15-30 minutes. These models provide different aspects of the atmosphere-ocean ENSO system. The ENSO forecast partners from NOAA and CSIRO aim to provide their official ENSO forecasts as early as possible on a monthly basis. Forecast products: The official ENSO forecast for the past three years.
