Q: How do I promote software like Evernote? I've been thinking about how I can increase awareness of software, and make the software's use more popular. Evernote provides an excellent service for note-taking, and is very user-friendly. How can I promote this type of software amongst a specific group of users? For example, how can I make note-taking more popular amongst students, so that they use it rather than their own personal and inferior versions of note-taking apps? A: Make it free! You could offer it as a free service on a website that is visited by a very select group of people. It won't help the mainstream market at first, but as the company grows, I believe you'll gain a large customer base and profitability will follow.

A: It depends on how large your audience is. If you can attract a large number of people to it (e.g. by giving it away free) then it is the same as promoting anything else. If, on the other hand, your market is a very small group of people, then you'll need to use other methods of getting the word out. I've done this before, with a project, that for convenience I'm referring to as, 'Project Apollo'. What it did was it provided an online space for a group of people to share notes and communicate about those notes. It was unique in that it was completely free, and thus all communications were free, and it only had a small number of users, but they were high quality users (they'd bought into the idea of it). In the end, I wasn't successful promoting it. It never really got the interest it needed to really grow. It had a huge potential - but there's no clear way to tell a dormant project that has a huge potential from one that doesn't. And it just never got used enough to develop the momentum that we'd need to keep it going.
