In a longitudinal study of 107 patients with arterial hypertension, the effect of anamnesis and diagnostic approach was analysed by means of a procedure of personal interview. From the results it may be concluded that anamnestic information is important in the differential diagnosis of arterial hypertension. The subjective symptoms of arterial hypertension in the history are the best for the differential diagnosis and classification of arterial hypertension. The combination of subjective symptoms and objective signs increases the likelihood for the correct diagnosis. This invention relates to novel triazole containing compounds and to a process for preparing them. In particular, the invention relates to the preparation of certain 3-piperazinyl-substituted triazoles which are potent and specific inhibitors of the enzyme renin. Renin is a proteolytic enzyme of the blood which cleaves angiotensinogen to angiotensin I. Angiotensin is a powerful vasopressor agent which raises blood pressure in mammals, and it is this action which controls blood pressure. Inhibitors of renin have been investigated as a means for treating hypertension. Direct inhibitors of renin have not been found, but there has been interest in identifying and developing indirect renin inhibitors, also called anti-sera. By indirect inhibition, it is meant a competitive inhibitor of a substrate of renin, rather than a direct renin inhibitor. As an example, there is interest in developing anti-sera to the substrate of renin, angiotensinogen. The substrate could be used to compete with the natural substrate for renin. The substrate is presently produced by recombinant techniques from a murine monoclonal antibody to human angiotensinogen. See, for example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,879,325, incorporated herein by reference
