where I use a lot of if and while statements. For example, I have something like this: `if(this.getState() == State.A) { // do something } else if(this.getState() == State.B) { // do something } else if(this.getState() == State.C) { // do something }... and so on` How do I move this to a function,

and then call it from inside
the main function? A: You can create a method

public void doSomething() { // do something }
if(this.getState() ==
State.A) { doSomething(); } else if(this.getState() ==
State.B) { doSomething(); } else if(this.getState() ==

State.C) { doSomething();
}... and so on or if you
want to get rid of the blocks public void
doSomething() {

Color Picker provides you
with a simple application
that you can use to view the RGB and HEX color codes for any color. Color Picker's main interface displays a 3D cube that includes points for every color. Just move your mouse over the desired hue and the codes will be automatically generated. After installing Color Picker you'll find the program in Start

Menu->All

Programs->Color Picker.

When launched it's main interface allows you to set the color you wish to select, input the RGB or HEX code for the desired color, and press the Select button to pick a hue.

When you're done, simply press "OK" to close the program. If you press the Cancel button, you'll return to the main interface. If you leave the program without pressing "OK" or "Cancel" then it'll generate the codes and store them in the default directory. If you want to use them in another program you can use the Load Code button in the main interface. Color Picker can be used to colorize your Windows desktop or it can be used as a standard, standalone application for picking colors from the web. There are 2 versions of the program. The "Standard" version lets you pick any color and it'll generate the codes for you. The "Professional" version lets you select a color and generate the codes in a semi-automatic way. The color picker tool is compatible with all Windows operating systems (95, 98, ME, 2000, XP, 2003, Vista).

The Color Picker software is free for home or non-commercial use only.

Please consider buying the Professional version if you need the program to work with colors from the web.
