IOC President Thomas Bach, speaking to reporters during a trip to Rio de Janeiro, maintained that the removal of medals was "unfair" and a violation of the International Judo Federation's anti-doping code. He said that the IOC has not addressed which athlete is responsible. The action by the federation follows the publication Friday by the New York Times of a report by a Russian whistle-blower alleging that it used a state-sponsored doping system to rig the 2016 Rio Games. At a news conference after meeting with athletes, Bach said at the time that he agreed that the decision was "shocking and unfair" but that the IOC will not change its position regarding who won and lost the 2016 Games. "We really could not change anything," Bach said during his visit to Rio. "We feel it's right to take the position we took at the beginning." The IOC was informed about the allegations by former Russian Judo Federation official and whistleblower Grigory Rodchenkov on Friday. In July of 2018, the IOC announced that the medals of the two Russian men were being nullified, allowing them to be redistributed, and that the Russian women's team had been unfairly subjected to random testing. Since the Rio Games, the International Judo Federation has been decertified by the World Anti-Doping Agency. The women's team in Rio was banned from competing under the 82138339de
