Optimisation of genetic transformants using high-resolution multi-well array platform for the detection of multiple loci by PCR. Comparative genomic hybridisation (CGH) is commonly used for the detection of genomic copy number changes. CGH also allows the identification of genomic alterations at the single copy level. In the present study, we optimised CGH analysis using high-resolution multi-well array platform for the detection of multiple loci by PCR. We studied the frequency of these alterations and their phenotypic effect on the zebrafish embryos, larvae and adult fish. We used the multi-well array platform to detect genomic copy number changes using a panel of nine zebrafish stocks, and we analysed their developmental phenotypes. Furthermore, to study the genotype-phenotype relationship, the spatial expression of p53 and Hif1a at the single cell level was analysed in these mutant stocks. The frequency of the mutations found in embryos of approximately 40% was comparable to frequencies found in adults. Furthermore, certain embryos with single loci deletions and duplications showed developmental defects, suggesting an important role of these genomic alterations in the pathogenesis of the mutant embryos. Moreover, the phenotypes were correlated with the spatial expression patterns of p53 and Hif1a. The occurrence of a very high frequency of loci-specific copy number changes suggests a role of these loci in the embryonic development. The zebrafish has become an established model for vertebrate development and for the study of human disease. These advantages are increasingly being used to uncover molecular mechanisms for embryonic development, and to understand the pathogenesis of human disease. High-resolution multi-well array platform can detect multiple loci by PCR, which provides a tool for the detection of multiple loci involved in the embryonic development. This will help to understand the molecular mechanisms of embryonic development.
