CYP17-21 gene polymorphism in patients with prostate cancer (PCa) and benign prostatic hyperplasia (BPH) and their associations with Chinese dietary habits. CYP17-21 genes is a metabolic enzyme for testosterone with a key role in estrogen synthesis. Recently, evidence has suggested that genetic variants in CYP17-21 gene are associated with the risk for prostate cancer (PCa). However, the relationship between CYP17-21 gene polymorphisms and the risk of PCa susceptibility and dietary habits has rarely been reported. Thus, the current study investigated the association between CYP17-21 gene polymorphism and PCa risk and dietary habits in a Chinese population. A case-control study, including 308 PCa patients and 308 healthy control subjects were investigated to determine the associations between CYP17-21 gene polymorphisms (rs743572, rs2464196, rs2464206, rs224518, rs887829) and dietary habits. Polymorphisms of these genes were analyzed by direct sequencing. The results show that the CYP17-21 gene polymorphism was not related to PCa susceptibility. Moreover, no significant differences of rs2464196 and rs2464206 polymorphisms in CYP17-21 gene were detected in PCa cases, compared to healthy controls. However, the rs224518 polymorphism was significantly associated with PCa risk, and the allele CT/CC of rs224518 polymorphism was related to a decreased risk of PCa. The PCa patients had a higher frequency of the rs2464196 CT/CC genotype than the healthy controls, and this polymorphism was associated with increased intake of fruit in the participants. These results demonstrate that the CYP17-21 gene polymorphism is associated with PCa risk and a protective dietary habit. 426 N.E.
