This paper provides a framework for policy makers to assess the activities of drug companies in developing antibiotic resistance. It is based on a systematic review of the evidence linking company-sponsored research to the development of antibiotic resistance. Direct and indirect links are identified between the research conducted by industry and the development of resistant strains of bacteria. Few studies have examined how the research relates to the development of resistant organisms and to the'real-world' effectiveness of the new antibiotics. There are concerns regarding the potential for companies to influence antibiotic prescribing through marketing strategies, and about the regulatory actions that are taken on the basis of data supplied by the companies. The paper concludes by proposing a set of criteria to assess whether the policy options proposed in the literature are viable and affordable, and by highlighting the need for a more thorough analysis of the potential for antibiotic resistance and company activity.Q: How to insert Oracle JSON object into 54b84cb42d
