Ufc Undisputed 3 Ps3 355 PkgThe old ways of making sausage are out -- think artisanal al pastor tacos and stinky hand-pulled sausages. Given the $4 a pound sausage trend, there are only a handful of small-scale outfits ready to take the spread to the next level. And when the latest sausage revolution kicks off next week at New York City's new Sausagefest, the competition could be fierce. Sausagefest is the brainchild of restaurateur Joe Burke, who plans on presenting the craft at his new Boqueria restaurant in the Meatpacking District later this month. The festival includes sausages from around the world, including Mexican favorites like chorizo and cotija (a dried, crumbly cheese), Cuban filled sopas and empanadas, and Southeast Asian offerings like satay, curry, and wontons. But don't be fooled by the festival's traditional take on gluttony -- the menu at Boqueria is a sophisticated affair, said chef Frank DeSimone, who's putting together the menu. "We want to make the best sausages that we can, but we're not going to offer pork and pork products," DeSimone told The Huffington Post. "We want to make something that we don't see often. We're using some interesting ingredients and looking at the food from a different angle." Sausagefest kicks off next week with a rollout of the new Boqueria menu, which features more than two dozen types of hot and cold Mexican sausage, including vegetarian versions and lean meat sausages made from beef and chicken. "There are many, many ways to cook with sausage," DeSimone said. "There are some very, very traditional ones, but we have some very experimental ones too." But if you're too thin-skinned for a festival like Sausagefest, perhaps the best bet for cinco de Mayo 2011 is to hone your own palate. This weekend, the Denver Spice Company is hosting a contest in which chefs create their own sausage recipes by themselves. "We are providing you with everything," Denver Spice company spokeswoman Alisha Fernick told The Huffington Post. "We have the whole kit and caboodle -- we have hot and cold links, casings, stuffing, cure, spices, herbs, and you get to make your own sausage." The contest features more than 70 competitors,
