Windows 10 has many new features that seem to appear in some other part of the OS and then are brought to the new shell or to the desktop. A new Task Manager looks for Windows 10: I reviewed this feature, and it is a powerful new element. But Windows 10 was not the only OS that brings new features to the desktop. Another of these new features is the ability to highlight icons and folders of the desktop in the new Action Center. Windows 8.1 had this function, but it was just the first step to Windows 10. In Windows 10 the theme is completely modified, and the Action Center was redesigned with new icons to facilitate the user to choose the elements and functions it will allow. Action Center You may remember the Action Center in Windows 8.1, which was integrated into the taskbar. In Windows 10, there is a new module added to the desktop, which will have the same functions, but is more intuitive and user-friendly. This element will have a little icon on the bottom right-hand corner of the desktop, which will indicate the focus of the elements that the user can activate and perform functions like installing or uninstalling apps. A new element in the desktop, the Action Center, consists of several elements, like in the old Windows 8.1. And to make it more intuitive, this new icon on the desktop will indicate the focus of the elements that the user can activate and perform functions like installing or uninstalling apps. More than a Task Manager In addition to the above, the Task Manager in Windows 10 has other elements that did not exist before, like the refresh rate, where the user can select the level of responsiveness to the desktop. For more information about this part, you can read my article, which I reviewed the new elements in Windows 10. In the new Task Manager, there are several new elements. There is a new element to configure the responsiveness of the desktop, which will allow you to select the level of responsiveness to the desktop. There is also the option to change the color of the tasks you have open in your taskbar, which you can do from the desktop right-click context menu.
