The invention relates to the general field of metal alloy substrates for printed circuit boards, and more particularly to a technique allowing the use of a thick metal alloy substrate in a PCB, and the use of a multilayer PCB including said thick substrate. The general trend in the development of products is the use of smaller and more powerful printed circuit boards (PCB). The smaller and more powerful the products, the smaller and thinner the printed circuits and the larger and wider the frames providing the contacts for the electrical elements and other electrical and optical components. For this type of use, a PCB is generally made by depositing one or more metal alloy layers onto a non-conductive substrate or preform. The metal alloy layers may be copper, tin/nickel, copper clad or zinc/copper clad. To achieve the desired electrical functions, the PCB may also comprise dielectric layers between the metallized layers. More recently, a thick metal substrate has been used. As shown in FIGS. 1A and 1B, the substrate 1 has a thickness of, for example, between 0.9 and 1.8 mm, and may comprise two identical or different metallized layers 10, typically formed of copper or copper clad. The substrate 1 is then laminated with several metal layers 11, each layer 11 being formed of an alloy between a main metal (titanium, nickel, and/or molybdenum, for example) and a dopant metal (zinc, cadmium, or hafnium, for example). After lamination, typically under a heat and pressure treatment, the metal layers 11 may be etched in a conventional manner so as to form electrical connections 12 for the electronic components. This type of substrate is well suited to handling higher voltages, for example from a few kilovolts to a few tens of kilovolts. The same substrate is compatible with standard technologies, for example, the well known double-sided technology and, optionally, it can be used as an inverter or, for example, as a half-bridge. The use of such thick metal substrates has also contributed to reducing the space taken up on the printed circuit board by the substrate, which must obviously be minimized. The use of very fine and small etched holes, to allow the electrical connections to pass through, is one of the methods used to minimize the space taken up by the substrate. The thick metal substrate will be expensive but it will be appreciated that

Perhaps the worst part of spring break is the prospect of returning to a job that's mandatory — or, worse, much like spring break in the paper-pushing sense of the term. We've all been there. But the question is, does anyone know how to get out? Several job search gurus have found the key to springing yourself out of a difficult job — you need to make it easy on yourself. “The reason people don't always give up is because they think of it as a trade: If I'm going to get up at 7 a.m., I have to get up at 7 a.m., and so I go through this mental gymnastics to convince myself that it's a fair trade — it's not fair for me to get up at 7 a.m.” It's hard to want to get up at a reasonable hour if you've just been working 24 hours a day (not that we're judging) and the prospect of getting up at a reasonable hour may sound like a cruel and unusual punishment. But setting a new bar in your life is a great way to kick your job search into high gear. Making it easy on yourself Searching for a
