While the First World War had never been a popular topic in Russia, the Russian Revolution was a cause for outrage in the hearts of many Russian people. Here are three of those thoughts which The Russian Revolution inspired: 1. I want a more prosperous life The major reason that people went on the uprising was to get a better life for themselves and their families. They wanted to get rid of the poverty they lived in, and the Tsar who had brought on this misery. Hence, a young, Russian male wrote an essay called The Night They Burned the Motherland, which was published on March 24, 1917 in The Nation, a newspaper published by the American Communist Party. 2. I want a revolution where the Tsar is dead The second important thought in the revolution was that the Tsar was being killed, and this would lead to a revolution in Russia where the Tsar is dead. The idea that the Tsar would not be able to do whatever he pleased, because he was an absolute monarch and exercised the power of the state, was one of the big reasons why the people of Russia demanded a reform. 3. Revolution in Russia from below to above The third thought was that Russia needed a revolution from below to above, or a revolution from the people to the government. For example, young people were, more than likely, better than the old Russia tsar, Catherine the Great, who did nothing good for Russia. The people were below the government, not above it. This thought inspired a lot of people to join the revolution and to help lead it. The major events that the Russian Revolution inspired included the February Revolution, the October Revolution, and the Russian Civil War. The main leaders of the revolution were Vladimir Lenin and Leon Trotsky. The actual revolution happened on the February Revolution of 1917, where the monarchy was overthrown by the Russian

The aim of the study was to evaluate customized implant support for a functionally oriented surgical procedure. Customized titanium implants were manufactured for microvascularized bone conduction hearing implants (Cochlear, Golden, CO, USA) in 5 patients with severe conductive hearing loss due to otosclerosis and in 1 patient with chronic sensorineural hearing loss. Bone conduction hearing was restored by microvascularized bone conduction implants alone (microvascularized bone conduction hearing implant alone) or in combination with a conventional implant (conventional and microvascularized bone conduction hearing implant combined). The postoperative course and the results were compared with those of a group of 5 patients who received a conventional implant and with another group of 17 patients who received conventional implants and were tested preoperatively and 6 and 12 months after the implant was inserted. Hearing results were significantly improved from baseline to the follow-up examination of the combination group. In the group of patients who received a conventional implant only, all the patients had preoperative hearing thresholds of more than 80 dB, which was improved to 37 dB in the case of 1 patient. In 2 patients the hearing impairment increased, and in 1 patient the threshold increased from 0 to 25 dB. In the group of patients who received a combination implant, all the patients had preoperative hearing thresholds of more than 80 dB, which decreased to 42 dB in 1 case. Two patients had postoperative deterioration. Microvascularized bone conduction hearing implants seem to be a feasible option to replace conventional implants for conductive hearing loss. can inject the drug or device, or remove it if it becomes dislodged or broken, without surgery and probably without the use of anesthesia.
