7.0, free animal pack 7A wrist is fixed with its distal end to a hand and pivotally supported at a wrist hinge portion, the wrist hinge portion being pivotally mounted on a forearm. The two pivot points of the wrist hinge portion are supported with respect to the forearm and the upper arm, so that the wrists can move in a vertical direction and a horizontal direction. The wrist hinge portion is located between the elbow and the top arm, and the elbow is pivotally supported by the forearm at an elbow hinge portion, which is located between the wrist hinge portion and the upper arm. The elbow, the wrist hinge portion and the upper arm are composed of a mass of bones and muscles, and a joint is provided between the bones. In a normal human arm, the elbow is a natural, neutral, neutral position joint, at which the muscles which operate the joint are relaxed. The elbow can not be in a natural, neutral, neutral position, because the axis about which the elbow joint is moved is not located in the bones of the arm, but instead is located in the muscles about the arm, which change the position of the elbow while the muscles relax. Further, the forearm and the upper arm also change the neutral position of the elbow. The weight of the arm is supported by muscles which are attached to the arm bones and act as tension members of a compression spring. When the arm is lifted from the body, the compression spring is compressed and the weight of the arm is taken up by the muscles as the muscles lengthen. When a strong, vigorous person pulls his or her arms apart in a lifting motion, the muscle tension is maintained and the compression spring is not allowed to compress sufficiently. Consequently, the weight of the arm is taken up by the muscles as the muscles lengthen in a lifting motion and this prevents the compression spring from urging the lower arm against the body,
