Eucommia Bark is an excellent herb used for the treatment of various diseases in traditional Chinese medicine. In this research, the protective effect of Eucommia Bark on lead-induced toxicity was investigated. Lead acetate was used to establish the rat lead intoxication model, and lead acetate poisoning significantly decreased the body weight of rats in the treated group compared to the control group. Lead exposure also caused significant decreases in the activities of liver acid phosphatase, serum total bilirubin and total protein in the treated group compared to the control group. Moreover, lead exposure also caused a significant increase in the level of lead in the liver of the treated group compared to the control group. Significant increases in acetylcholinesterase, lead-induced lipid peroxidation, and in the activities of liver superoxide dismutase and catalase in the treated group compared to the control group were also observed. In addition, the increases in blood lead, acetylcholinesterase, lead-induced lipid peroxidation, acetylcholinesterase and lead were significantly reduced in the group treated with Eucommia Bark. In conclusion, these results indicate that Eucommia Bark has a protective effect against lead-induced hepatotoxicity in rats.
