Differential expression of the airway smooth muscle T-box transcription factor Brachyury during embryonic development. Brachyury is a highly conserved transcriptional regulator expressed predominantly in the developing mesoderm. Brachyury is a T-box transcription factor, and mutations in this gene have been linked to failure to form mesoderm in the developing embryo. In airway smooth muscle, inactivation of brachyury in adult mice results in a fibrotic rather than smooth muscle phenotype, suggesting that brachyury may have important roles during development of the airway wall. Here we examine brachyury expression patterns in the early and late stages of mouse airway smooth muscle development, in situ, using brachyury transcriptional and immunostaining reporter constructs. Brachyury transcriptional activity is most prominent in the pharyngeal, branchial, and extra-thoracic regions of the mouse embryo. At the early stage of allant
