While they didn't need to touch one another, Pittsburgh Penguins captain Sidney Crosby and Ottawa Senators forward Erik Karlsson did come to some agreement on the Ice Level. Crosby was sitting alone between the benches, and he and Karlsson went into a little verbal dance when they were racing to set up face-offs in the first period of Sunday's Game 3. After the two got some distance from one another, and the Penguins decided to bring the fight back into the game, Crosby chirped Karlsson with a few comments, but there wasn't any trash talk that got him kicked out of the game. At the end of the second period, Crosby and Karlsson made their way to center ice and shook hands. Karlsson, who seemed shocked by the way Crosby talked to him, commented to Ben Chiarot that they did a little "together thing, then they did a "butterfly thing" on the ice and then came over to the bench. Crosby saw the two talking and joined them. They shook hands again on the ice. Fans took notice of the exchange and briefly booed the duo. After Karlsson left the ice for a bench-clearing scrum that eventually saw him ejected, Crosby was shown in the box with Karlsson. Crosby and Karlsson were teammates for parts of last season, and they made their way to the bench to play a few face-offs together after each team had won a face-off, according to the Penguins' radio broadcast. However, Crosby has a long history of being a captain and defending his teammates in all situations. Crosby took a lot of heat last season after Ottawa forward Mark Stone was knocked out of the 2018 playoffs by a hit from Tom Wilson. Crosby backed Stone even though he wasn't the one directly involved in the hit.

What's New In Adobe Photoshop 2022 (Version 23.0.2)?

On the eve of Friday's most anticipated parliamentary election in the UK since 1997, I have no choice but to take a well-deserved holiday. Well, almost a holiday. I have to go to the ballot box, share an election party with all those lovely people in the trade union movement who have been campaigning to make this election day a public holiday, and count the votes. I'm visiting the polling station of St George's, Stratford in east London, where I will be helping out at the local Labour Party office. It's part of the "Get out the vote" efforts happening everywhere in the capital – among other places, in east London at Wallington and Bethnal Green. It should be business as usual, but these are tense times. The result of this election will decide who gets to shape the country for the next five years. There are a lot of Tory MPs to be elected. They are considering shutting down the NHS and forcing universities to hike up tuition fees. There are just as many Labour MPs to be elected, who will fight to keep the NHS open and will fight to reduce tuition fees. Who will win will be decided by four seats in the south-east – where UKIP is holding the balance of power at the other end of the country. Before the European elections the Brexit Party, led by Nigel Farage, promised to win all four of the seats. They were never going to win them all, but the renegades have a major problem. Their two MPs in the South-East have been suspended under the terms of the Returning Officers' Code of Conduct. This is the first use of the code, and it's part of a major overhaul – introduced by the Electoral Commission – to the way the British Election Process works. Now, if you think of the Electoral Commission as a body with a mission, not of regulating democracy in the UK, as many would have it, you can see that it has now been given a new task. This is in order to make sure that when people take to the polls in these seats, they can be sure that their votes are counted. What has happened to Nigel Farage's MPs is that there's a review into whether he has broken the code, although it's not really his fault: all the rules have been changed since he joined
