

Some people mistakenly refer to the "Adobe Photoshop" as Photoshop. Using Adobe's name in conjunction with its products or calling it a single-product company can lead to sales and exposure confusion. Many people think that if you're using

Photoshop, you're advertising and using a single product. We have long promoted Adobe Creative Suite as the best software suite to produce professional results. It is not a single tool. How does Photoshop work? Photoshop contains both raster image processing operations, such as filtering and color correction, and vector based operations such as converting, editing, and retouching. The simple operations performed through most tools in the main menu are called raster operations, since they operate on the raster (a digital photograph or any two dimensional image file). The more complex operations are also raster based operations, but utilize the vector (three dimensional) capabilities of Photoshop. These typically enable drawing tools and line drawing techniques. The Photoshop file is composed of layers. A layer is a single object contained within a file that overlaps the layer underneath by a certain amount. In this way, multiple objects can be stored in a single file. Each layer of an image has an individual layer mask. If an object is moved, rotated, or adjusted in some way, the mask can be adjusted to show what is moved, rotated, or adjusted. The objects that are moved, rotated, or adjusted can be brought back on top of a layer to be visible again.

Photoshop allows you to organize the layers on your document by arranging them into folders that enable you to create projects. You can also organize layers by calling up a dialog box and naming a folder as a "sort folder." In the left column, there are many different folders you can use, such as Layers and Presets (usually the last folder you add items to the Photoshop Presets feature), although they can be changed to suit your needs. Each layer can contain its own individual adjustment layers. An adjustment layer allows you to change the appearance of a selected portion of an image using a set of sliders. This could be your image brightness, contrast, or color balance. You can also create adjustment layers to change the appearance of smaller sections of an image. You can also create and edit smart objects. A smart object is a layer that can be selected, adjusted, and duplicated or moved throughout a file without affecting any other object. To edit a smart object, simply adjust it and

The Disapproving Parent – Part II
Joining up with “the good parent” (Granny), a quick trip to Granny’s house for a cup of tea and a matinee of “It’s A Wonderful Life.”

The Disapproving Parent – A Pastoral Perspective
If “the good parent” comments regularly on your parenting, there’s probably not much for you to do except listen. However, if you find yourself being confronted by the occasional “disapproving parent” your response will likely be different. It’s no secret that the “disapproving parent” is the second-most frequent pastor’s kid (after the happy-go-lucky child who gets a pass from the pastor’s kid). Unfortunately, the “disapproving parent” often leads the pastor to do or say something that will diminish their faith in the church or in the pastor’s ability to lead a congregation. Here are three responses to the “disapproving parent” that you might consider making in order to avoid the disconcerting experience of walking into the church with a bad feeling. First, respond with a sincere “Thank you.” The “disapproving parent” isn’t picking on you but in fact is being supportive of you. It seems no small thing to your pastor-child if someone says “good job” to you. God would appreciate it too if someone cared to remind you that you're doing a good job. Second, when faced with the "disapproving parent," make a decision to stand firm and maintain your level of respect for the church. That way you won't be turned off by lack of respect in the church and your pastor-child won't get a bad taste in his/her mouth about the church. You need to be the one to say: "I care about the church and will attend church and vote for church issues that matter to me.” The “disapproving parent” will give it up because he/she knows you will not be swayed and will remain strong. The “disapproving parent” will be grateful to have “stood up to” the pastor-child. The child will not be bitter; the child will understand the church’s
