"She was born to be killed." "Come on, man, we got to get moving." "We're gonna be dead by morning if we don't get out of here." "You're a real shakedown artist." What's New In Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.5)?

Q: Can a function call on a deleted object be used as an argument to a function? To avoid a memory leak in C++, is it OK to provide a pointer to a function as an argument for another function? I am thinking specifically about a void* used to pass a function pointer. template T* object_call(T* f) { f->a(); return f; } int object_call_1() { int* x = malloc(10); *x = 2; return x; } int main() { int px = object_call_1(); printf("%d ", object_call(px)); return 0; } I know there are lots of variations of this but I'm wondering about the general code style and stability (i.e. in this particular case if there is a memory leak, is it very likely or certain to come out of the box). A: The only problem you will run into, depending on the complexity of your code, is this: int main() { int* px = object_call_1(); printf("%d ", object_call(px)); return 0; } Since you're passing a pointer to object_call, you're passing a copy of the pointer. Since you're then dereferencing px, you're using it after it's already been destroyed. However, even if you avoid this particular issue, there's a much bigger problem. By calling object_call, you are violating the Law of Least Surprise. What happens when you call object_call, but object_call doesn't actually do anything? If you aren't careful, it will cause your program to segfault! Johnnie Fusillé Johnnie Fusillé (born 28 December
