A number of devices have been developed to prevent such inadvertent falls. One such device is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 5,908,094 to Marquardt and U.S. Pat. No. 6,106,481 to Anderson. Both of these devices include removable connectors that attach to opposite sides of the seating and are anchored to the floor or wall to prevent the seating from being accidentally removed. Although these devices may have provided some protection against falling, these devices do not function to prevent children from being pushed out of the seating. In addition, there is a risk that the child, who may be wearing a diaper, will unintentionally wipe and soil himself while attempting to get out of the seating and onto a floor or a nearby seat. In addition, the child is apt to bite or suck on the connector or pull at his clothes to escape the seating when the seat is pulled from the floor or wall, thus presenting a potential danger to the child or others around him. Prior art seating is very limited in the number of different positions that the seating can assume. For example, such prior art seating can function in a variety of positions, including a stowed position when not in use and a free standing position. The free standing position typically includes a base having
