So, if you are from United States, you might be wondering, how the new HIPAA law is going to affect your secure internet connection. Before getting into the VPN review, let me help you understand this HIPAA law, The new healthcare law, commonly known as the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, was signed into law by President Barack Obama on August 21, 1996. It was meant to make the health care system more secure by offering people better access to their own health information. Since the law came into existence, the medical industry has done quite well. That is because a lot of internet scams are popping up out there to help people out of a financial crisis. The new HIPAA regulation comes into play when a network or computer systems are providing services to covered entities. The Government expects medical professionals to get information and report any incident that compromises the security of the patient's data. The government have made covered entities responsible for making information available for its patients and caregivers. The moment an organization or a network allows the transfer or storing of the patient's information, the organization becomes responsible for the secure storage and use of the patient's information. That means, it is the patient's responsibility to be careful while dealing with online connections. To sum it up, the new HIPAA regulation can be clearly said to be a law that can help your medical profession. Before the VPN connection is established, the two devices communicate wirelessly using key codes. Both devices are paired using the same code. Now, you will need to choose the VPN location in which you want to connect to. Take some time and think about where you want to connect to. From the point of view of security, the best option would be the VPN server that is located in the country where you are doing your work. As a precaution, I recommend connecting to servers located in a country other than where you live. When you choose a VPN server, you are making sure that you are connecting to a country where the laws of the region do not have the same scope as your country.
