Ancestral introgression in high-latitude, cold-adapted Drosophila species. Gene flow between phylogenetically distant taxa can result in the introgression of alleles that increase adaptation to novel conditions. During speciation, introgressed alleles may hitchhike to fixation, potentially providing a molecular signature of long-term genetic isolation of biological species. In contrast, introgression can be adaptive during admixture between species, and may even be favored over sympatric speciation under certain circumstances. Here, we test for patterns of introgression between high-latitude (HL) and tropical-temperate (TM) species of Drosophila, and measure the relative selective strength of introgression as a function of population size in intergrade zones. We quantified species-wide patterns of population genetic differentiation, migration and effective population size in HL and TM species that exhibit within-species contact zones. We found that speciation events are more likely to have resulted in HL-TM intergrade than sympatric speciation. However, introgression is also found in sympatry, and the rate of introgression appears to be independent of population size. In contrast to previous studies that have examined introgression in microevolutionary time frames, we find that introgression and gene flow occur frequently enough to maintain genetic homogeneity in high-density populations during intergrade periods. These findings suggest that introgression in HL Drosophila species represents a case of biased introgression between aHL species that may ultimately facilitate adaptive divergence without physical isolation.
