ACLU: Nearly half of women inmates have had sexual abuse, harassment By LAURA MANDEL The Associated Press Thursday Nov 14, 2017 at 8:01 AMNov 14, 2017 at 8:01 AM More than 50 percent of women in state prisons in the U.S. have been sexually abused or harassed during their incarceration, a new study shows. The report is the first nationwide analysis of the frequency of sexual abuse, harassment and misconduct against female inmates and attempts to understand their impact on prisoners' lives. Inmates identified as being victims of sexual misconduct reported a range of injuries and mental anguish, from heightened anxiety to post-traumatic stress disorder. Other negative health effects included depression and drug and alcohol abuse, the study found. The report also found that nearly half of the women reported being sexually abused or harassed by a prison staff member. The report was released Thursday by the American Civil Liberties Union, Human Rights Watch and the Women's Refugee Commission. Nearly 1 in 10 women in state prisons were reported to have been raped by another prisoner or staff member. "We need to treat these women and the people who do this to them as sick and criminal, not victims," said Sarah Krakoff, associate director of Human Rights Watch's Prison Project. Of the 2,063 inmates surveyed, 74 percent said they were treated with respect and dignity by prison staff. But only 20 percent of respondents reported receiving information about the law or their rights in prison. The study found that women are more likely to experience sexual abuse and harassment than men in prison. For instance, nearly two-thirds of the inmates said they
