----- Song Info: Displays basic information about the song (name, artist, album,...) Playlist: Displays information about all the playlists Songs: Displays information about all the songs Playback Controls: Displays all the available playback controls Playlist Commands: Displays the available commands System Status: Displays the system status of the music server Media Library: Shows all the media, if configured properly. Settings: Shows the settings for this client. (when not able to read media or if unable to use it: On the settings window, select the information) Interface User Interface Both the PPC and G4 version of the music player work with a graphical user interface, which allows you to: play files on the music server browse the media collection manage playlists edit tracks set the system settings access and control the music server's controls Control the music player Running software cannot access the computer's controls, such as volume, mute, etc. In order to access and control them, the music server must be running and enabled. To activate the controls, set the Music Server configuration file to start automatically, and then restart the Music Server: Open the Music Server configuration file and set the Music Control Server to Enabled. Edit the line, start with: musiccontrolserv= and change it to the desired Music Control Server address and port. Add the following line at the end: ;musiccontrolserv=";" Set the Music Control Server config file to start automatically. Restart the Music Server: $ cd /etc/init.d $ cp /usr/local/bin/musiccontrolserver /etc/init.d $ sudo /etc/init.d/musiccontrolserver start Notes: The client will restart and the music server will start automatically whenever you change the configuration file. The PPC version of the music client does not have a GUI. You will need to run the server and control it through command line. Serve up music To let other applications access your music, you need to configure your server. There are two main ways to do that: Point to a file in the music collection, and have the music client automatically update itself. Allow other clients access to your music Id6a3396d6
