Here's a radical idea: if our leaders can't even stop an out-of-control truck from getting onto the upper deck of the George Washington Bridge, perhaps they should have spent more time looking for a way to stop a fugitive. The answer to that question is "yes." But as a former federal prosecutor, I'm not sure that's a politically safe answer. Absent a specific law of the land, our government is compelled to enforce only those laws that are capable of being enforced. If no police officer has the authority to enforce a particular law, then we have no police officers. The same is true of the federal government: we have no police officers if an agency doesn't have the authority to enforce a particular law. In July, a jury acquitted John Salvi of the first-degree murder of Julie Poplawski, a schoolteacher in Philadelphia who had been shot to death during an attempted drug bust. Both the prosecutor and Salvi, who has a lengthy history of violent offenses, were confident that the law allowed the death penalty for this particular crime. The next day, the U.S. Attorney's Office, under new leadership, decided to change the office's policy and file the death penalty to prevent the next "repeated" murder. This is not an uncommon decision. Attorney General William Barr has been unafraid to kill the rule of law. On his first day in office, he appointed U.S. Attorney John Durham to investigate the origins of the Russia investigation. Apparently, there are serious questions as to whether or not the president unlawfully sought to obstruct that investigation. Attorney General Barr also chose to close the case against former CIA Director John Brennan for his questioning of the president. No wonder President Trump called Barr a "good man." At the end of the day, if President Trump thinks Barr is a good man, Barr is going to carry out the president's orders. Now, let me be clear: it is not the job of Attorney General Barr to implement a president's constitutional understanding of the rule of law, the notion that the law is what the president says it is. It's his job to obey the law. But the president and his administration have encouraged Barr to ignore the law to protect him. Why do that? Because both the president and Barr have come to believe that the

During the lifetime of a patient, it may be necessary to perform a total shoulder replacement procedure on the patient as a result of, for example, disease or trauma. In a total shoulder replacement procedure, a humeral component comprising a metal bearing surface is utilized to articulate with the head of the patient's humerus. In such a total shoulder replacement procedure, the shoulder joint is essentially replaced. The head of the humerus has two bones in close proximity to one another, namely the glenoid, which has a generally convex bearing surface, and the scapula, which has a generally concave bearing surface. To stabilize the humeral component, the humeral bearing surface articulates with the glenoid bearing surface. To accomplish this, the surgeon tacks the prosthetic head onto the prepared glenoid.
