Tools AutoCAD's primary method of interfacing to other systems is via the interface of its command line tool, autocad.exe. In addition to creating AutoCAD drawings, AutoCAD's interface can load or save files in other formats, execute a scripting language, automate drawing tasks and create output (PDF, DXF) or markup text files. AutoCAD 2012 supports editing and rendering in both PostScript and PDF formats. AutoCAD 2013 also supports saving in native.DWG format. Autodesk also developed a Plug-in for AutoCAD to use Microsoft Internet Explorer (MSIE) to open and save web pages with the CADDyno web browser. The new AutoCAD browser, called CADDyno, replaces CADDyno.exe and CADDynoHTML.exe as the primary method of using AutoCAD for web development. The plug-in also allows AutoCAD to be used for Internet publishing. Licensing AutoCAD can be licensed on a perpetual or non-perpetual basis. The perpetual license (AU $2,495) is valid for a single user (on the same computer) and is the only option for individuals. Other options include standard (AU $1,995), home use (AU $995), volume license (AU $6,995), and a small business license (AU $3,495). The home use and volume licenses include the perpetual license. Acquisition In May 2006, Autodesk announced the acquisition of Alias, Inc., a company that specialized in CAD visualization and markup solutions and in providing systems to create and view CAD data. The result of this acquisition was the Alias Technology Group and Autodesk Vault. In the wake of several major acquisitions in the past year and Autodesk's smaller market share, Autodesk CEO John Walker has attempted to turn the company into a more consumer-oriented software vendor. AutoCAD, Building Design Suite, and other non-linear software were also being rebranded, as well as Autodesk's CAD offerings. On 14 August 2008 Autodesk acquired Manifold Systems, a provider of digital design services, from Ramco. Starting in 2012, Autodesk acquired ObjectARX (part of The Ensignten Group) which was made open source in 2014. On 1 October 2014 Autodesk acquired MeshLab (from GTS a1d647c40b
