If I have a hot thermostat and I am cooling something with water, is it ever possible for heat to flow backwards in a closed system? For example, if I have a heat exchanger and I'm cooling my laptop with water pumped through it is there a chance that the water that is pumped into the heat exchanger can absorb heat from the laptop's air and heat it up? If a closed system can happen in any thermodynamic process, then why can we never have the working substance being cooled by the environment at 0 K? A: If I have a hot thermostat and I am cooling something with water, is it ever possible for heat to flow backwards in a closed system? If you are "water cooling", it is impossible for heat to flow backwards. The whole cooling process is reversible, but it starts with some heat flowing from the hot water to the hotter device, and ends with heat flowing from the cooler device back to the water. At the start and end of the process, heat flows from the warmer to the colder, and that is the definition of the second law. If you think of the water as a refrigerant, and heat into the device as the calorific power, then you can view the process as a reversible adiabatic process. That is the definition of the third law of thermodynamics. A: If I have a hot thermostat and I am cooling something with water, is it ever possible for heat to flow backwards in a closed system?

Yes. If you look at the way the thermostat works, you can think of it as a binary system where heating is represented as a state with an infinite number of configurations. A state like this would have the property that all configurations with lower energy (such as heat) flow to it. A change in a system's energy state can always be represented by a configuration with a higher energy.

When the thermostat heats up, it can move from a state with many configurations of lower energy to one with more configurations of higher energy. This transition can in principle continue indefinitely, but it has to end with a state of lower energy. Once the thermostat cools down to 0K, it can no longer take energy

Everyday at 5am my Django website crashes and then restarts. I am using a Heroku app and I'm not using any superuser. I think that some my code tries to login and get a user object but I don't know where and why because it crashes. Does anybody know what could be the problem and what is the easiest way to start my server at 5am? My Django project is running on a Heroku app. A: You're not the only one who's having this problem. You can run Python for sure. I don't think your Heroku app runs a script. When you do run "heroku run python myscript.py", it should start a new Django instance, running in a new background process. A: You can trigger the 'requirements_install.sh' script, which will do all the required setup for you and that can then be cronned. From here, you can see how to install requirements for your app. 1. Field of the Invention This invention generally relates to a bicycle suspension assembly and more particularly to a bicycle suspension assembly which has a relatively simple construction, is inexpensive, effective in damping the oscillations of the rear wheel caused by a bump or the like, and can be easily and effectively constructed and maintained. 2. Description of Related Art A conventional bicycle suspension assembly comprises a main member and a linkage connecting the main member with the rear wheel of the bicycle to damper oscillations of the rear wheel caused by a bump or the like. The main member includes a front swinging member pivoted to the frame of the bicycle and a rear swinging member pivoted to the rear end of the rear wheel. The linkage connects the main member with the rear wheel of the bicycle so that when the rear wheel of the bicycle is oscillated by the bump or the like, the oscillations of the rear wheel are transmitted to the main member through the linkage and the oscillations of
