Thermopylae and Plataea.Q: Is static_cast overloading really possible? I'm currently trying to make the move from Java to C++, so I'm trying to familiarize myself with the new language. One thing I'm curious about is the fact that static_cast is overloaded. So, for example, when I try to put an overload static_cast(str);, it fails. Because of this, I figured it was impossible to overload static_cast, but I'm not a hundred percent sure of that. So, is it possible to overload static_cast? A: static_cast is overloaded? no. Overloading in C++ is syntactic sugar which provides a shortcut for a task. (It's pretty much just specialisation). If you have: struct Base { float foo(...) }; And we have: struct Derived : Base { float foo(...) }; We could overload foo so that we would not have to cast the object before invoking it. If we have a static function foo: class Base { public: float foo(...) }; We could overload it so that we would not have to cast the argument: class Derived : Base { public: float foo(...) }; You can't
