Sankey JK,. 49 (1995).In the art of the manufacture of integrated circuits devices, an important aspect of their operation is in realizing that a device which is isolated on a substrate may be electrically connected to a substrate or other device by contacting its terminals in some desired manner (usually by making contact with the terminal pads) to external connection terminals. The technique generally used for such a purpose is that of soldering. The most typical step in the soldering operation is that of positioning an electronic part on the surface of the substrate. This is generally accomplished by using a device known as a lead manipulator. In this respect, the requirement of a lead manipulator is that it be able to properly position (at least initially) the electronic device (e.g. a chip) to the substrate and that it be able to position the device so that it will be contacted with the electrical connection terminals of the substrate. The present state-of-the-art lead manipulator device is a mechanical device which accepts a number of lead contacts, positions them properly relative to the semiconductor device and then inserts them into solder (therefore contacting the leads with the substrate's contact terminals). The essential mechanical positioner of the present device consists of a die which receives the contact leads (which are usually hollow) and seats them into a solder pool. The lead contacts are then allowed to settle into place with this d0c515b9f4
