Yet the mechanisms involved in the regulation of melanin synthesis are not fully understood. The melanosomes contain melanin within its core, which is a pigment where melanin is made. Formation of the core occurs in two steps. The first is the formation of a new polymeric protein (dopachrome tautomerase, DCT) from a membrane protein (tyrosinase) and a redox-active flavin molecule (p-coumaric acid) in the endoplasmic reticulum. The subsequent step is the transfer of p-coumaric acid from the polymeric DCT to the melanin precursor, dopaquinone. The polymeric DCT is assembled in the matrix of the melanosome and acts as a template to synthesize p-coumaric acid and dopaquinone. The specific aims of this project are to isolate the melanosome-specific melanin polymerases and to investigate their function. This project will focus on 1) the identification of genes encoding human melanosome-specific d0c515b9f4

The tethering effect is one of the mechanisms that leads to impaired function and severe mitral regurgitation in patients with mitral valve prolapse (MVP). We studied the effects of the local properties of the endocardium on the tethering effect of the prolapse by measuring the tethering area and tethering distance. We also calculated the area of the prolapse as well as the tethering distance
