For decades, evidence has pointed to the possibility that lead could create damaging effects in humans. Lead, a toxic metal, has been blamed for a wide variety of illnesses including learning disabilities, headaches, and even sudden death. New evidence now indicates that lead can be found in human teeth, and not only in children. Older adults have teeth that include lead at the same levels found in children. Lead exposure has always been an issue because it is one of the most prevalent toxins in the world. The metal, created during combustion processes, is a common ingredient in gasoline, paints, plastics, and other products. Children are especially vulnerable to lead's toxic effects, with one in 50 children now thought to carry a blood level of lead in excess of the current standard of 5 micrograms per deciliter (mcg/dl) of blood. This level is based on evidence from studies of humans and animals showing the threshold of harm when levels of lead in the blood begin to accumulate. Experts, however, now suggest there is also a threshold of harm when lead is detected in humans teeth. "Since lead accumulates in the body over time, the longer you have the exposure to it, the greater the body burden, but not everyone gets a toxic dose of lead all at once," explains Lori H. Morel, a postdoctoral researcher at the University of Cincinnati, and lead author of the study. "In the absence of symptoms, it takes years for you to build up enough lead in your bones and blood to cause harm. For children, children's teeth represent a large reservoir of lead and are a point of entry for the toxic metal into the body." The study results were published in the February 12 issue of the Journal of Trace Elements in Medicine and Biology. Morel and her colleagues detected lead in plaque samples taken from the teeth of 41 New Orleans children. Their teeth were between 3 to 14 years old, and the plaque, which was found on their teeth and on their plaque, was between 1.2 and 2

It is irritating to wait for a program to open and then get frustrated when it does not behave the way I want it to. If I want to install a program, I want to get it up and running, doing what it is supposed to do. I will probably end up having to uninstall the program, just because I found it didn't behave the way I wanted it to. What is worth mentioning in relation to the trial offer is the ability to trial this product first, and then know if you really want to purchase it, or not.
