Q: c++ Qt, local variable initialized, it's not shown in other classes so I've got a class that contains a number of local variables. I'm in a mutex for that class. I have an instance of this class, and in the constructor I run the following line. `// recog_node* current = new recog_node; // current->in = true;` Now, in a second class I'd like to use that instance. So, I simply do this `recog_node* n = new recog_node();` I can access `n->in` to true, but I can't access `current->in` to true. How can I fix this? A:

1.The memory address of current is not the same with the object that you create. use first and second(); or use shared_ptr
2.Make another object of the same type of recog_node, or use proper copying mechanism
The present invention relates to an electrical contact for electrical current and, in particular, to a connector with matched electrical and mechanical properties. The present invention relates to a connector with electrical contacts. As it is well known, the connector is a complex mechanical and electrical assembly for the connection of conductors, for example, of a power cable, with a mating connector in order to allow the transmission of electrical signals, for example, for the control of a certain apparatus and/or transmission of electrical power from a source to an appliance. Currently, the connectors are made from metal, usually in one piece, which constitute, or include, a tubular body with external slots. The tubular body is provided with internal contacts. The contacts are disposed in such a way that they receive a portion of the conductors, in particular, the core of a conductor, and have a circular cross-section. The contact, also called xe2x80x9csocketxe2x80x9d, comprises an inner cylindrical portion, made of a high-conductivity material, which is inserted into the tubular body and has a circular cross-section. Also, the contact is provided with a shoulder and with a head to which a contact is affixed. In the known connectors, the contact is disposed inside a tubular body and between two metal inserts of the body. The metallic inserts are provided on the lateral sides of the tubular body
