The effects of a photoreactive derivative of N-(3-dimethylaminopropyl)-4-azidophenyl-1,2-diaminopropane ([³²P]azido-A2P) on activation of phosphorylase kinase (ATP:phosphorylase a phosphotransferase, EC 2.7.11.1) and phosphorylase phosphatase (EC 3.1.3.6) were studied. Phosphorylase kinase activity and phosphorylase a phosphorylation were measured with an immunochemical assay and thin-layer chromatography, respectively. Photochemical reaction of [³²P]azido-A2P with purified kinase and phosphorylase phosphatase yielded the same three products: [³H]4-azido-A2P, (³²P)³-, and (³²P)²-azidophenylimidazolines. Although in a 2 X 25% polyacrylamide gel the 4-azido-A2P photolabel was found in all phosphorylase kinase subunits, only serine residues could be identified with a ³²P-homogeneous immunopurified phosphorylase kinase. Light inhibits the production of brown adipocytes in the Siberian hamster. Exposure of Siberian hamsters (Phodopus sungorus) to light for more than 4 h/day suppresses the development of brown adipose tissue (BAT) in the hamsters. To determine whether this growth inhibition is due to a direct effect of light on the BAT itself or to a more general inhibition of brown adipogenesis, cultures of epi-brown adipocytes were grown and the effects of light on the growth and differentiation of these cells was examined. In four-day old cultures exposed to light for 48 h, the percentage of cells containing lipid droplets was 35% lower than in
