There's no denying the popularity of cellphones in the U.S., but a new study by the Pew Research Center suggests Americans aren't satisfied with their tiny, sometimes frustrating, companion mobile devices. The study revealed that nearly two-thirds (62 percent) of adults polled said they "completely or somewhat agree" with the statement "I am not satisfied with my cell phone." This statistic is even more interesting given that the overwhelming majority of Americans—91 percent—own a cell phone. The Pew study also revealed that smartphone owners tend to be satisfied with their gadgets, with 86 percent of cell-phone owners saying they are "satisfied" or "very satisfied" with their smartphones. The smartphone crowd's love of their gadgets isn't limited to cell phones. The study revealed that tablet owners generally were very pleased with their devices, with 78 percent of tablet owners saying they were "satisfied" or "very satisfied" with their tablets. However, the study did not indicate a correlation between satisfaction and use of smartphones and tablets. The study revealed that about half (50 percent) of American adults own smartphones, while about half (47 percent) use a tablet to access the Internet. The survey found that tablet owners were more likely to own more than one device. About half (52 percent) of tablet owners and 57 percent of smartphone owners own two or more gadgets. The study also revealed that satisfaction with a smartphone does not correlate to ownership. About three-quarters of smartphone owners (77 percent) are satisfied with their devices, but satisfaction levels among smartphone owners were similar to or lower than satisfaction ratings among non-smartphone owners. On the other hand, the study's findings suggest that satisfaction is higher among people who use their devices for a single function. For example, only 40 percent of tablet owners who also own a smartphone are satisfied with the devices, which suggests that people who use multiple functions on their tablets are less likely to be satisfied. Other findings include the following: Overall, about 13 percent of smartphone owners and 35 percent of tablet owners say they are dissatisfied with their devices. On the other hand, about 18 percent of tablet owners and 38 percent of smartphone owners are satisfied with their devices, meaning these groups are more likely to be satisfied. Fewer than three in 10 smartphone owners and fewer than four in 10 tablet owners say they are satisfied with their devices. About four in 10 smartphone owners and five in 10 tablet owners are satisfied with their devices.
